Undergrad: California State University Los Angeles Bachelors in Social Work '18

Graduate: California State University Long Beach Masters in Social Work PPSC '20

Career: Currently I’m working as support staff for adults with disabilities, but I hope to work in a school setting as a Social Worker after I graduate CSULB

College vs High School: In High School, you have numerous people pushing you to do better: your teachers, parents, friends, family members, and counselors. In college, you don’t have as many people pushing you. That’s where individual determination comes along. In high school, if you’re not doing too well, someone will let you know in advance and help you do better. In college, a lot of the time, you won’t know you’re behind until closer to the end, which makes it difficult to catch up. Not impossible, but difficult.

Advice: You could plan for everything. You can take the proper steps and have an idea of where you want to be and what you want to do, but sometimes things take an unexpected turn. Don’t be too hard on yourself if you find yourself lost and not knowing how you got to where you are. If you would have told me that I’d be studying Social Work, I would have laughed and told you my dream was to go to the moon. I guess my advice is just to be open to new things and trust the process. Look around you, there’s people that got through high school and are now in higher education or already graduated and they got through trial and errors. You’ll get through it, too.
